Title of the Article: "Your Amazing Toddler"

Author: Elizabeth Rusch

Resource: Parents Magazine, August 2015

Summary:

Who: This article is about the different things that toddlers should be able to do during different stages of toddlerhood.

When: This article specifically addresses the span of 1 year to 2 years.

Where: This article provides safety tips for in the home.

What: It describes what toddlers can understand, how they can feed themselves, and things they should be able to do on their own. One of the most interesting parts of the article was when it gave specific examples of appropriate and inappropriate behaviour. The article also explains four things that toddlers should not do. Some of these things include: unloading the dishwasher, and eating while they walk. One of the important parts of the article was when it describes words of caution about each of these topics. The final part of the article offers suggestions for places where we can find more information about this topic.

Critique:

The part that I found most interesting in this article was the stages that toddlers go through when they are this age. I thought the article was well written for parents, as it is easy to read, and information is broken into segments, so parents can choose which parts they want to read. I think that most parents would appreciate how clearly written this article is. I am able to connect the information in this article with my life, as I have babysat toddlers in the past. That was the reason I chose the article. I see a lot of similarities between the kids described in the article and those that I used to babysit. One question I had after reading the article: what should parents do if their children are unable to do some of the actions described in the article?
